Famous Love Letters

Whenever Jim Larsen saw Annabel Jones, his heart did an acrobatic flip-flop! Sometimes, it seemed to jiggle so violently that Jim was sure Annabel could see it! But Annabel never seemed to know that Jim had a special feeling about her. "After all," Jim brooded, "I just can't walk up to her after class and say, 'Annabel, you're beautiful! Your eyes are the deepest blue in the world, your hair is like silk, your skin . . . ? Ah, what's the use?'"

The truth of the matter was that this romance was in Jim's mind, for he was far too shy to do anything about it. Annabel would never learn about Jim's love! It was this disturbing thought which shook him as he browsed through the library bookshelves one afternoon. A title caught his eye, and he reached out for the book. "Famous Love Letters"! And they were just the kind that he'd want to send to Annabel, if only he had the courage! He knew he didn't—but it would be wonderful just to have those letters for his very own, to look at whenever he thought of his dream girl. And so, opening his notebook, Jim began to copy them, one after the other—the very letters which famous poets and artists had, in time gone by, sent to their lady loves.

The very next day, all was forgotten, however, what with a stiff math exam that lasted two hours. The exam was so tough that by the time Jim was through, he staggered from the classroom, bleary-eyed. And behind him, on his desk, forgotten, lay his notebook.

He was halfway down the street when a thrilling voice called after him. "Jim! Jim Larsen! Wait for me!" It was Annabel Jones, looking prettier than ever as she raced down the street, waving a familiar-looking notebook in her hand. "You—you forgot this!" she said.

"Oh, thanks, Annabel! It—it's my notebook," Jim said lamely. He could never think of anything to say to her when he had the chance. He started to turn away, when Annabel put a hand gently on his shoulder. "Wait a minute, Jim," she said. A soft flush covered her cheeks. "Before you go, I want you to know that . . . that I kinda like you, too!"

All the way home, Jim trod on fleecy clouds. "How? What? How does she know how I feel about her? How come I made the grade? How?" It wasn't until much later, when Jim glanced into his notebook, that he found the answer. Every single one of the love letters he had copied began, "Darling Annabel!"

Shopping AROUND!

Margie Hopkins had never been so humiliated in her life! If there was anything she hated, it was shopping—and now look at the spot she was in! She had just finished buying the last wieners at the meat counter of the supermarket, and was stuffing them into one of those awful paper bags when Tom Biddle made his appearance . . . and made his way slowly in her direction! “M-maybe he hasn’t seen me yet,” she gasped to herself. “Imagine, with my arms full of packages like this—could anything be more undignified?”

Appearances were terribly important to Margie, particularly where young Mr. Biddle was concerned. She had long worshipped him from afar, praying that he would condescend to notice her—but that wonderful event had never as yet come to pass. Tom showed not the slightest sign of being aware of her existence, let alone acknowledging it by word of mouth. And now—to be caught in this awful spot! If ever he were to see her holding packages—well, obviously her last hope would be gone! He was drawing closer now—quick, there must be some hiding-place! Behind that tall pile of canned goods—that was it! She could stay there until he was gone, then emerge safely. And so, from the shelter of the cans, she saw Tom Biddle walk towards the meat counter, speak to the man and then turn away, a look of disappointment on his face.

When she could no longer see Tom through the front door of the market, Margie gathered all of her hated parcels, paid the cashier and started out the door. But she never made it. For the door suddenly opened inward, smacking right into her and spilling her bags of groceries, fruits and those vulgar wieners right to the floor! And then the horror of it really dawned. For the person who had opened the door was none other than Tom Biddle himself! And now Tom was kneeling on the floor and raking Margie’s purchases back into the paper bags. “I beg your pardon,” he was saying. “I was just coming back to see if—wieners! You have wieners!”

“I—I just can’t stand this shopping around,” Margie stammered, but Tom cut her short. “My favorite food!” he was saying. “Just what I’ve been trying to buy, but no luck!”

“I know,” Margie faltered. “You see, I bought the last of them!” And then, amazed at her own temerity, she added, “We’re having a wienie roast at my house tonight. Like to come?”

“Like to? I’d love to!” Tom laughed. “Golly, imagine meeting a wonderful girl like you in a market!”

As for Margie, she was too happy to speak. But she knew that from now on, shopping was going to be her favorite pursuit!
